

Postal Service Pauses New Mail Ballot System

After a Supreme Court decision, USPS says election mail will follow the old rules for this year's federal elections.

The U.S. Postal Service has stopped work on a new computer system that would have changed how some mail ballots were handled, according to Associated Press reporting published by PBS NewsHour. The decision came after the Supreme Court rejected President Donald Trump's executive order for this year's election. An executive order is a written direction from the president to parts of the federal government.

The order had told several federal agencies to create state citizenship lists. Those lists would have gone to an online Postal Service portal, or secure website, and the Postal Service would have used that system to decide which voters could receive mail ballots. A mail ballot is a ballot sent through the mail instead of filled out at a polling place.

Postmaster General David Steiner, the top official at USPS, told the AP that work stopped because there is an injunction. An injunction is a court order that blocks something from happening, at least for a time. Steiner said the Postal Service will not enforce the new rules in the 2026 federal election. A federal election chooses national leaders, such as members of Congress.

This matters because the Postal Service is not just a place for packages and birthday cards. During elections, it helps move ballots between voters and election offices. Many Americans vote by mail because they are away from home, have disabilities, work long hours, live in states that use lots of mail voting, or simply choose that option. If mail rules change close to an election, voters and local election workers may have to adjust quickly.

The stopped system was controversial because it would have put the Postal Service in a bigger role in checking who could receive a ballot. The Postal Service is an independent agency of the executive branch, which means it is part of the federal government but is supposed to make many day-to-day decisions on its own. Steiner said he focused on how the order could be carried out, not whether the policy itself was right.

A whistleblower report released earlier this month by Sen. Richard Blumenthal of Connecticut said the system was built quickly and had many errors. A whistleblower is someone inside an organization who reports what they believe is wrongdoing or a serious problem. Steiner said he read parts of the report and agreed that building such a large system fast was difficult. He also said he had confidence in the Postal Service technology workers who were building it.

The president's order also would have required states to use the same style of ballot envelope with barcodes. A barcode is a pattern that machines can scan to track or sort an item. Some states said that change would be hard so close to the election.

Even without the new system, mail voting still depends on timing. The AP reported concerns about postmark delays in Washington and Oregon, two states that use vote-by-mail widely. A postmark is the mark showing when the Postal Service received a piece of mail. In some places, that date can help decide whether a ballot counts. Steiner said voters who use mail should send ballots early, and he recommended allowing seven days.

The bigger civics question is how to balance two goals at once. Elections need rules that protect voting from mistakes or fraud. They also need rules that are clear and stable enough so eligible voters are not confused or blocked. Courts, Congress, states, the president, and agencies like USPS can all affect that balance. That is why a story about mail can also be a story about democracy.

THINK IT THROUGH

1. When election rules are being debated, how should leaders weigh security concerns against the risk of confusing or blocking eligible voters?

A strong answer: A strong answer should consider both election integrity and access, and should explain why timing and public trust matter.

2. Should an agency like the Postal Service have a limited role in elections, or is it reasonable for it to help enforce voting rules? Defend your view.

A strong answer: A strong answer should distinguish between delivering ballots, checking eligibility, and making policy decisions.

3. If a state or federal government wants to change election procedures, how close to Election Day is too close, and why?

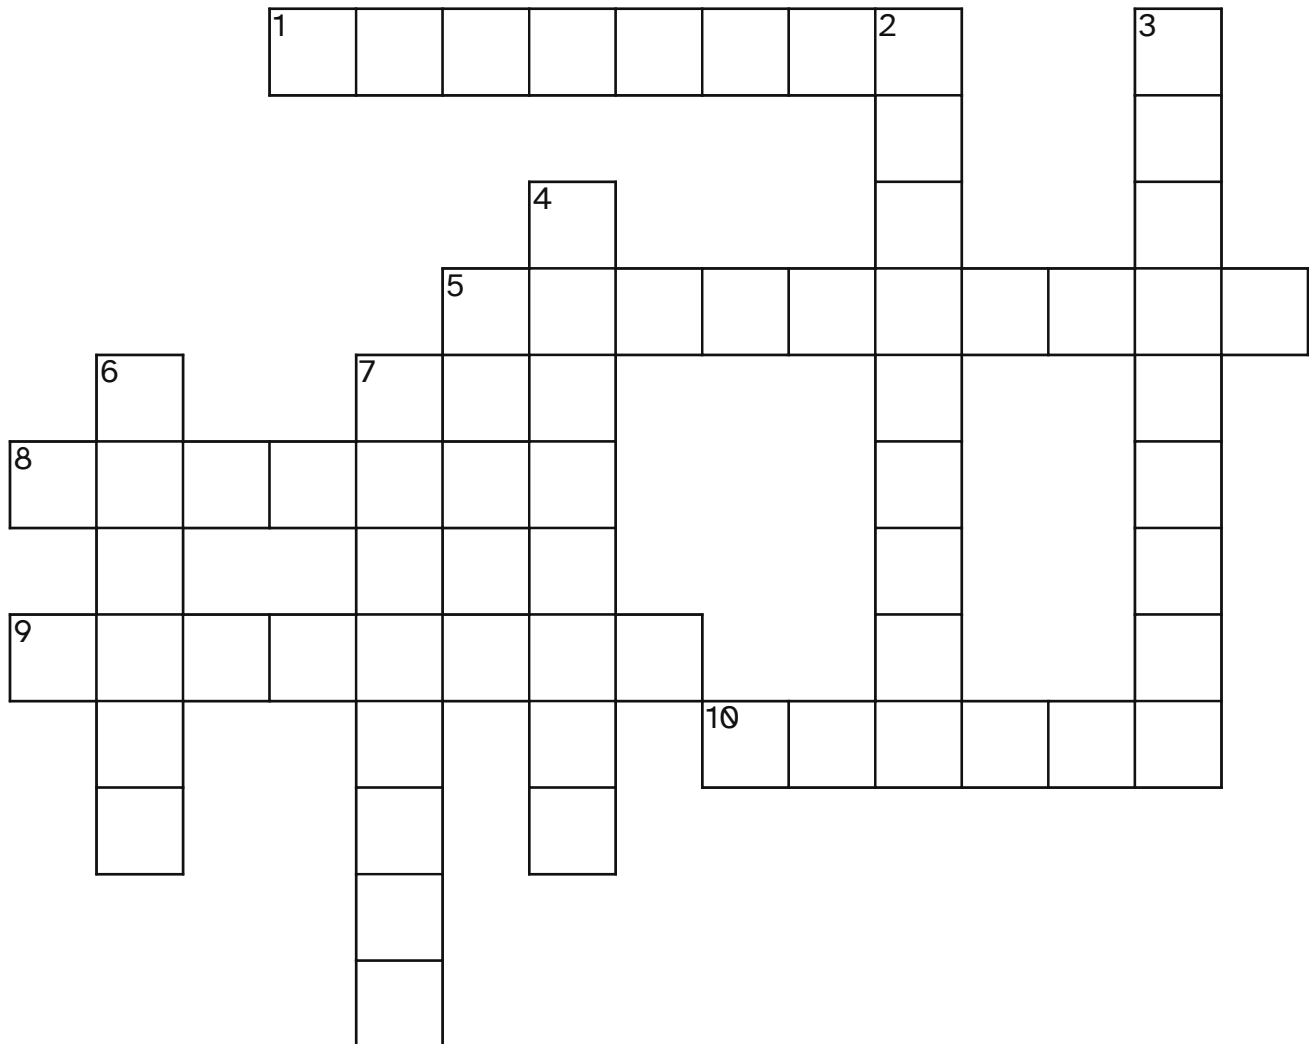

A strong answer: A strong answer should discuss practical effects on voters, local officials, technology systems, and fairness.
